Parenting Tips/Info.

When Can My Baby Start Drinking Water?

Like humans beings, babies do need to take in water to survive. But they don't actually need to drink water - in fact, pediatricians advise against giving your baby plain or distilled water until he or she is six months old. Babies get their water needs met by drinking breastmilk or formula, both of which are mostly water.

The reason your doctor will tell you not to feed your baby plain water is that it's easy to fill up an infant's stomach; a few little ounces will do the job. Babies should be filling up on nourishment - getting the nutrients they need from each feeding.

Once your baby has been teething, he or she will need fluoride to support the new teeth, so giving drinking water is a good way to meet that need. But until then, let your baby get water in his or her usual feedings of mother's milk or formula.

Reminder to Parents

- Remember to read your child's daily reports in case something is needed for the next day.
- Please label your children's clothing and bring in blankets labeled for nap time.
- Please don't forget to take your children's sheets and blankets home on Friday's to be washed.
